::Discussion Questions::

- 1. Increases in tuition fees can often serve as a catalyst for student struggles, by allowing them to draw in large numbers of participants. What other issues might mobilize large segments of students, outside of standard “activist” circles?
- 2. The #RhodesMustFall movement is an example where a largely symbolic protest movement quickly transformed into a nation-wide movement for free, decolonized education. What are some of the similarities and differences between this movement and similar movements against racist/colonial statues in so-called North America?
- 3. What are some of the practical benefits of connecting student struggles to those of campus workers and faculty staff? What are some ways to start actively building these connections in the absence of a large student movement?
- 4. What are some pros and cons to organizing in smaller student groups devoted to single issues, or those who seek equity for oppressed identities, vs organizing around issues like tuition that often tend to take place within student unions?. How can one strategy be used to complement the other?
